WHOOPING COUGH

Whooping cough is a disease of the respiratory tract. It is a very contagious disease and is most prevalent in children. The symptoms of whooping cough are a series of spasmodic coughs, which are usually followed by a long, high-pitched whistle. The coughing usually begins with a cold, and the child may become very ill. The disease is most common in children under the age of five years.

There are three or more distinct stages noted in whooping cough. The symptoms of the first or catarrhal stage are similar to the ordinary cold with an attendant cough. In the second stage the coughing becomes more and more frequent and is usually followed by a long, high-pitched whistle. The expulsion of mucus or vomiting commonly ends the attack of coughing.

Pneumonia and convulsions most frequently occur among children who are suffering from malnutrition. There is no communicable disease which exacts a high toll among very young children than whooping cough. Whooping cough is a highly communicable disease and the young and poorly nourished should be protected in every way from coming in contact with this infection.
