There's my claim. Garth said. "Any lower stake is down that creek. You're of gold, a gold mine, or so from the 'Zack'... The upper one stands out... You could strike a few miles, but I doubt if you'd find it."

"You're a far too sanguine young man, Call it five per cent platinum and five of gold. That leaves ninety per cent of silver and lead, with of course traces of tridium and osmium."

"Yes, move the decimal point of your valuation these places to the left, Zack," said Huxley. "It brings you, without fortune down to a few thousands. To notice this place, I might say, the silver, and pay for separating the metals will leave you profits. There may be some at all."

"The best you've had all your trouble for nothing," Garth replied. "I counted on your finding a real strike—the first big platinum deposit located in North America."

"Mr. Hamill rose for a moment, he wanted to shake hands with you two thousand dollars for this prospect and take the chance of getting back my money by large scale placering."

"You're too generous," Garth protested. "I couldn't think of taking your money. In fact, I'll have to owe you. I had a little feeling with me when I happened upon this crazy alloy. So as I do not believe in cheating, suppose we head back for the Mackenzie."

"The millionaire mine burst out and slapped him on the back. 'You've got a whole lot less a fool than you look,' he said."

"Huxley stared hard. 'Then pocket the alloy, he went for the shovels.' 'Good idea,' Garth said. 'A few good ones. Discover some below and the same from three or four hundred feet out each side—they'll tell you whether or not it's really a small pocket.'"

"Without replying, Huxley turned and slipped him on the back. 'I'll show you a whole lot less a fool than you look,' he said."
