Gunlock Ranch
OF FRANK H. SPEARMAN
CONTRACT FARMERS' MARKET

He thought for a moment, "I had never over to you at the ranch house, Jane."
She could not escape the significance of his tone in saying "at the ranch house." "The old place," she had always called it. It was not a ranch, it was a home. "I'll be waiting for you when it comes," she said.

Alone in the hall he saw some of the old furniture still drifting slowly up from the street. It was laden with the fragrant smell of a house and a sense of the old life. He looked at the window and saw the old furniture still drifting slowly up from the street. It was laden with the fragrant smell of a house and a sense of the old life.

One of the boys, Bill Page stepped promptly to Jane's side. Before he reached her, she turned and ran. Her eyes were fixed on the door and a great moan came out of her mouth. "I can't go," she said.
