C. C. C. CAMP

Earl has gone to Ft. Sam Houston at San Antonio on a short leave for the purpose of having his eyes examined. Seven of the boys are also on leave at present. In the air and in the Spring. During the past week three men have left the call of distant places and possibly returned attachments and have obtained discharges to accept other employment. These include Gordon H. Elliott, Colmesneer, James W. Dalley, High Island, Alfred Bonacker, Fort Boney. Plans are being made for the construction of new quarters for the Tech. The building will be of the portable type and will be shipped from the Paris camp. We are having another dance in the camp recreation hall on Friday night, May 14. It is expected an orchestra from Beaumont will play. Why not come down and have some fun.

Back On a Short Vacation Visit

Mrs. C. A. Yarbord of Raymond, Wash., left Monday after a few days' visit with Tyler county friends. Mr. Yarbord was happy to have the opportunity of showing hands with both white and colored, as they entered the Long Bell office Saturday to draw their checks. Mr. Yarbord was in the Long Bell office for years before going to Washington.

HONORED AT SOUTHWESTERN U.

James S. Mann, Jr., son of Dr. and Mrs. J. S. Mann of Colmesneer, was recently elected to serve as president of the associated student body of Southwestern U., Georgetown, for the year 1937-38. He has been active in many phases of campus life since his enrollment in 1934, and won an easy victory over his opponent, Roy Tynor of Keras, Navarro county, in the general election. Aside from the new position to which Mann has been called, he will serve next year as president of Kappa Alpha social fraternity for a second term, as president of the lettermen's, as president of Phi Gamma, and as president of the fraternities. Mann has returned for two years as an end on the Southwestern Pirate football team. He entered the university with a fine athletic record from West Columbia high school. It is understood that he will be leading candidates for captain of the Pirates next year.

Woodville Locals

Mrs. E. M. Riley, with Mrs. S. McGraw, was in Beaumont Tuesday. Charley Eaves returned home with them for the week...

...the most horrible... The place, formerly a farm, was overgrown with weeds and brush and blackberry bushes. Vaughn said to Jim as they walked through the dimly lighted room with cobwebs and littered with empty soda cans, "I'll have a rope and mud-skin blankets and corn-cobs and fodder."
"The land should be worth something," Jim said.
"That estate doesn't hope anything in the present market," Mr. Vaughn replied. "No, we'll take a licking on this."
They came out into sunlight. Jim's eyes moved over the weed-grown over in the meadow, the sagging rail stumps, the fence budding forlornly under the low branched trees.
"Was it ever a paying proposition?" he asked.
"Yes," Mr. Vaughn replied. "Four or five years ago it was tremendously successful."
"I should think if it might have been," Jim said musingly. "The location is excellent. It's only a mile from the Green Acres club and within a short distance of four towns. I suppose nothing of the country places around. What happened?"
"The place changed hands. The last fellow who ran it had a much better idea. I suppose it requires a certain amount of personality to make a success of a riding academy. It's like an inn or a hotel house. You have to cater to people's whims and caprices. The ladies especially must be pleased. Now, you—Mr. Vaughn looked at Jim speculatively. "You have some of the qualifications. Do you think you could take over this place and make it go?"
Jim's heart leapt. He steeled it with a prompt application of common sense. Mr. Vaughn wasn't in earnest. He was merely talking. "I've had no experience," he replied as casually as he could.
"You know something about horses," Mr. Vaughn persisted, regarding him earnestly.
"Oh, something," Mr. Vaughn's eyes twinkled.
"MacPherson told me you brought Lady through an attack of the cold the other night."
"It wasn't bad. She was in fair shape when she arrived. I know a few simple remedies. There were horses on my uncle's place."
"Whitehall—old beyond Crestnut hill."
"The King place?" Mr. Vaughn asked quickly.
"Yes, sir. I lived with my uncle. He was dead when I was a child."
"MacPherson came from the King place," Jim smiled.
"So, that's the connection."
"Him?" Mr. Vaughn looked thoughtful.
"Princeton—29. I'm one of the last generation."
"I'll think on it," Mr. Vaughn said. He stood for a time on the steps of the house looking over the property with a minutely appraising scrutiny. Presently he walked to the gate.
"All right," he said. "Let's go. The short drive back to Meadowbrook was accomplished in an almost unbroken silence. Once Mr. Vaughn coughed from his disfigurement to ask, "Know anything about fox hunting?" and, some time later, he said in an abstracted voice, as though he was thinking of something else, "I've had some experience. That's the combination."
Jim would not let himself believe that Mr. Vaughn was considering the proposition he had mentioned so casually. But he thought of it during the afternoon, to the exclusion of Londa's house party and the opportunity he'd lost for promoting Cecily's scheme.
"It was about a quarter of six. He hadn't much appetite. What's the matter, Jamie?" Mrs. MacPherson asked, disguising her concern in a simulated yawn. "That's shortcake, and you haven't touched it."
"It's swell," Jim assured her. "I'm not hungry, that's all."
"Jim glanced at MacPherson. The lean, sandy Scot was regarding him with an expression which he did not understand. There was kindness in it, affection and pride.
The same expression puzzled him later, when Tommy came to the house.
"What does Mr. Vaughn want with you, Jamie?" Mrs. MacPherson asked when Tommy had delivered his message and gone.
"Wants to see me, I guess. Jim paused to answer the question on his way upstairs.
"I doubt that," MacPherson said quietly, and it was then that Jim saw again the expression he noticed at supper.
(To Be Continued)

...the country doctor when death seemed to have come with the night. How the storm and raising his heart almost still by light. To stand beside a bed where one we loved was wrapp'd by pain. A small boy flung onto a horse, had dashed off thru the rain. And thru the darkness and the storm he hammered and he shout At a door, till the doctor waked and heard and hurried out.

With his emergency kit packed and on the busy seat. He flung the harness on the horse and had the boy repeat. Then he grabbed up the lines and whips and snapped holdback and trace. The name of those who wanted him, and then he knew the place. As he knew every place in all the storm-swept countryside. There he grabbed up the lines and whip and thru the gate, left wide.

Always for such emergencies, he swung out and was gone. And thru the darkness and the storm urger his horse on and on. That was the story of his life, from youth till his last long breath. Through sun-warmed days and storm-swept nights, always a race with death. His specialty was every ill; his slogan was "Get there!" When he arrived death knew defeat, and hope replaced despair. He never asked "what can you pay?" and never questioned "I think the world will never look upon his like again." The old time country doctor, in the hearts of all those he served still shines his monument.

An Open Letter to JOHN DOE

Dear Mr. "Doe": You are interested in providing good food for your family at a reasonable cost, expecting service and courteous service. Having sold groceries for over 30 years I have found certain lines outstanding in quality.

Among these lines is H. J. Heinz Co. Crosse and Blackwell, Del Monte and Libby Packing Vegetable Fruits Condiments and Specialties.

Of course, you want flour occasionally and White Crest and Light Crest are outstanding brands of quality.

Then when we tell you we have Crown Snow Drift, Crustene and Wesson Oil besides other brands of shortening, you realize that in this detail we seek quality.

McCormick's Spices and extracts, Jell-o are other items; not to mention P & C Soap, Old Style Dutch Cleaner, Kimo, Oxydol, and if you have a flock of Chickens we must tell you of the Purina Line of Feeds, which are unsurpassed and in doubt if they can be equaled.

We will be glad to list you as one of our customers and demonstrate service and courtesy par excellence.

Respectfully,

KELLEY
