

Examining the Baccalaureate League

The American daily press has been telling of how the swing artists are attempting to put over a movement to streamline the American Anthem.

We feel sure they do not fit all styles of beauty, complexion and physical cariatid.

Then, too, wouldn't it be a good idea for the college presidents, those who put over the learned Baccalaureates, to be garbed out in a suitable uniform and, too, a cap?

Apparently, they were years in advance of their time and age, too, the streamline term had been invented back yonder when scalping the white settlers was one of their chief amusements.

So why not deck out the deliverers of streamline Baccalaureate League oration—which often do not produce even one lonely smile—with a Sioux streamline cap and a gown of many colors?

The Booster is merely making this suggestion, attempting to keep up with modern thought and action, for this is unquestionably a streamline age.

Supt. Lee Hensley informs The Booster the libraries of the elementary and high school will be open all summer for the benefit of children who are interested in obtaining reading of all kinds.

Remember? The local 1938 commencement makes us old timers recall the days when we were young—and when we proudly participated in high school graduation ceremonies. Photos posed by NBC artists.

Then came the commencement speaker (played by Bill Thompson), who challenged you to face the world. Serious, purposeful, he might have been a rising young lawyer or a professor of economics from the university.

Then came the class prophet who predicted that 20 years hence you'd be a famous explorer... or some thing. Betty Caine, dressed like yesterday's graduate, shows how the prophet looked as she glanced into the dim future and made her awesome prognostications.

THE PALACE

BY CHRISTINE WHITING PARMENTER

COPYRIGHT BY CHRISTINE WHITING PARMENTER

And her dream was to come out of the first time—perhaps, thoughtfully his wife had not been fulfilled. The knowledge brought him a sense of his unworthiness. He said, voice husky: "I'm a moron, Nora—a dumbbell—a complete washout. I hadn't an idea that you were missing anything. With me, you know, home is simply where the heart is; I ought to have understood that a woman feels differently—needs some place to call her own. Why didn't you tell me? I'm only a blundering man, I'm afraid. But I love you and I haven't meant to be self-centered. Of course we'll buy that barn if it's what you want and there's sufficient cash on hand to pay for it. Come on, let's start. Let's take a look at our future home. Your mamma is more than a wonder, Jimmy. She's something that's utterly impossible to describe, and we don't deserve her. Watch out, Nora. Here's the big wave you prophesied a while ago!"

CHAPTER XI

It was early summer when they bought the stable with its surrounding seven covered pastures, its stretch of dunes and beach. Don, a smile of understanding, had presented the deed to Nora with such a flourish that the white-haired notary who witnessed the signatures, inquired if she were planning to "make a palace of that old barn?"

"I've seen her do things even more incredible," laughed Don; while Nora, her face lighting at the old man's words, responded:

"It will be a palace to me, anyway—my shining palace. That's what we'll call it. I think to your inspiration, Mr. Moore. If ever you're tempted to read the modern poets, look up Milly and perhaps you'll understand."

"To be surprised the notary quoted without hesitancy 'not was not your shining palace built upon the sand?' Well, this future home of yours is surely built upon the sand; I have no doubt you'll make it one surprisingly. Yes, I love the rule books, Mrs. Mason, though as a rule I taste in poetry as an old-fashioned man as I am myself. But I've been reading Milly's 'The Land of the Living' and that makes a difference. Let me know when the latch is out, and I'll play my respects to the Royal Family!"

"We'll bid you to dine some evening in the banquet hall," smiled Nora as they turned away.

"And who," said Don, when they stood in the sunlight outside the hideous frame building which housed the notary's small office, "who would suspect that aged patriarch of reading the modernists?"

"I would, retorted Leonora. "He's a perfect example of what the world calls a scholar and a gentleman. But he'll never know how superbly that quotation fits our case. Father bid me open back in the days when he was fighting the thought of our marriage, that to survive, a house must be built upon a rock."

"Safe upon the solid rock the ugly houses stand; Come and see my shining palace built upon the sand!"

It was Leonora who suggested moving in.

to the sound of hammer and saw, while small Donald sat on a nail keg and handed things to his father as requested, forgetting in this absorbing interest that he'd intended tunneling to Italy that season.

It was Leonora who suggested moving in. "It'll save the long walk right and morning, Don. It'll save time, and it can't be much more inconvenient than the shack is now. The living room—" ("Ball room," corrected the builder dryly) "is entirely finished. The fireplace burns like a breeze, and there's a sink in the kitchen even if there's no water running into it."

"And speaking of water," observed Don, "the report on this well water is O. K., Nora. It came this morning. Why shouldn't we move?"

Thus there came a day when with the aid of two Portland movers (hailed by Jim Perkins as they passed through town, Nora's beautiful piano stood on the spot planned for it; and Don said: "Christen the ballroom, Nora. Play something appropriate. On with the dance, let joy be unconfined!")

So, seated upon an upturned box, Nora played, and looking up as the haunting strains of "The Beautiful Blue Danube" died away, beheld the entire working force, apparently hypnotized.

Old Tom Littlefield stood in the doorway staring straight ahead through a window that faced the sea. One of the Portland movers (perched on a barrel) appeared to have gone into a sort of trance; while the other was wiping suspicious moisture from his eyes, and Jim Perkins stood, before the fireplace, arms folded, dead sunk forward, lost to the world.

Don, as the music ceased, didn't look up at all. His wife suspected that he was in the same plight as the second Portland mover. Even the carpenter remained quiet; and at last the mover seated on a barrel said: "I remember that tune. Seems as if my wife must have played it when we were going together."

"That's queer," the other man observed, shamefacedly thrusting his handkerchief into a pocket, "but darned if I wasn't thinkin' that very thing! Kind o' kind o' brings things back, don't it?"

The carpenter's blue eyes twinkled at this confession.

MRS. BESSIE HOLLINGSWORTH

It is with sincere sympathy for the family that this reporter writes of the death of Mrs. W. F. Hollingsworth, who we know and often transacted business affairs with while she owned the Folk County Enterprise and she was a resident of Corrihan. Mr. Hollingsworth passed away in June of last year and his wife has not been well for a number of months. Part of this year she and her daughter, Mrs. J. C. Welch, spent time in Hot Springs, Ark., hoping it might benefit her, but she passed away Monday morning at her daughter's home in Benton, La., with the Rev. Albert Windham for many years her pastor in Corrihan, but now of Jefferson, officiating. She is survived by the daughter and three sons, Clark of Beaumont, Albert of Corrihan and Stanley of Kramling, La.
