CARIBBEAN CONSPIRACY

By BRENDA CONRAD

They were in the kitchen, the very heart of the house, and the very heart of the conspiracy. The water is warm and very deep. There are signs of things and intrigues.

"I prefer them family. You've got to have a family to take care of," Miguel said, his mouth tightened to a thin line.

"Take this envelope up to the kitchen and give it to the woman in the white dress. It's from me. I'll be there in five minutes."

"New York, New York," Miguel said, his mouth tightened to a thin line.

standing by, as they went to the kitchen. The great picture of the black and yellow stars stared at Miguel. He was watching intently, his eyes fixed on the woman in the white dress. She was holding a letter and looking at it with a frown.

"Miguel, this is from the woman in the white dress. It's from me. I'll be there in five minutes."

"New York, New York," Miguel said, his mouth tightened to a thin line.

"Let them go, Miguel. Let them go, I tell you!"

Miguel and Valera looked at each other. They were in a doorway, looking out at the street. The man was holding a gun, and the woman was looking at him with a determined expression.

"What's going to happen?"

"They're pretty human even if they are tough," Miguel said. "I guess they might let them go. But you know, they would have to let them go."

"That's that," he said, not very steadily.

He stood looking at the woman in the doorway. She was looking at him with a determined expression.

"I'm sorry, it's a swell guy."

He tossed his cigarette over the balcony into the street. "So I take it all back, Annie. I hope you'll be swellly happy. Because you're a swell guy too."
