Social Security Now Designed As An Income Supplement

Is social security enough to meet your retirement expenses? Now it isn't, says Mrs. Fatsy Yates, Extension Manager, Life Education Specialist, Texas A&M University.

"Texas families now receiving social security payments are often finding them inadequate," Mrs. Yates adds. Social security is a form of insurance designed to supplement, not to replace other forms of retirement income. Too many families fail to make other provisions for income after age 65 or 66.

Recent research in four Texas areas shows that 83 percent of the farm and 74 percent of the urban families studied received social security payments. Yet, it was necessary for some of these families to also receive widow's pensions.

Forty-two percent were living on an income of $1,000 or less. In extreme poverty with less than $1,000 income a year, seventy percent had a substandard level of living with a yearly income of $3,000 or less.

"When you add to the above figures all the widows of widowers receiving social security income that are being able to make ends meet, it is very sad picture," says Mrs. Yates.

"Families must plan for adequate retirement income long before they reach that age," she added. According to Mrs. Yates, only action now will prevent the picture from becoming even worse for Texas in the future.

Net proceeds from ticket sales go to aid nearly 13,000 inmates of the prison system for rehabilitative services furnished by the State Legislature.

CURRIE'S AG NOTES

Small grain disease problems can be largely solved by planting seed which have been treated with a chemical fungicide for disease control.

The treatment process is simple and cheap and excellent insurance against crop losses from seed-borne diseases, says County Agent C. R. Currie.

Many small grain diseases are caused by organisms carried on the surface of the seed and can be easily controlled. Loose smut of wheat and barley is an exception, explains Currie. The organism causing this disease is carried inside the seed and cannot be controlled by chemicals.

Application of seed treatment fungicides may be made in homemade treaters or by commercial seed treatment plants. Regardless of the equipment used, it is important to get a uniform coverage of seed with the recommended amount of the material, emphasizes the county agent.

Improper coverage of the seed or the use of rates lower than those recommended greatly reduce the value of the practice, says Currie.

Because all seed treatment chemicals are poisons, they should be handled with care, cautions Currie. No more seed should be treated than will be planted, he adds, and treated seed should never be fed to livestock or poultry or mixed with untreated seed which may be fed. He advises strict compliance with the label information for both rate of use and handling precautions.

Due to the number of materials which may be used, the county agent suggests that farmers needing detailed information drop by his office for it. The recommended materials are normally available from farm supply stores, he said.

Zinc deficiency, an increasing problem in greenhouse tomato production, can often be brought on by certain soil management practices.

Dr. John E. Larsen, Extension horticulturist at Texas A&M University, lists six practices which can cause the trouble as cited by the American Zinc Institute of New York.

Phosphate Fertilizers—Heavy application or prolonged use of phosphates can reduce zinc uptake by the crop. Larsen says the effect may arise either from the zinc-depressing trait of calcium in the phosphate, or by fixing the metal in unavailable form.

The horticulturist added that studies of effect of phosphate on zinc are contradictory, probably because of zinc content difference in the fertilizer.

Liming—Zinc is most available in soils that are acid and low in calcareous materials. Liming decreases acidity and might boost zinc-fixing capacity of the soil, especially soils high in natural phosphate.

Land Leveling—This practice is fine for irrigation and other purposes, but it sometimes turns under the topsoil and exposes subsoil. Total zinc is apt to be short in subsoils.

In land leveling experience in North Dakota, two-thirds of available zinc in the top 4 feet of soil was found in the uppermost foot, Larsen said. Also, land leveling operations may bring the zone of lime accumulation to the surface. Calcareous materials in this zone may fix zinc in unavailable form.

Nitrogen Fertilizers—High nitrogen fertilizers sometimes raise zinc requirements beyond the available supply by increasing total crop growth. Larsen says form of nitrogen also is important. In one study, sodium nitrate decreased zinc uptake while ammonium nitrate and ammonium sulfate increased it.

Manure—Frequent use of large amounts of poultry manure may induce zinc deficiency, probably by increasing total organic matter in the soil.

Crop Rotation—Zinc shortage in field crops is more common after a high zinc uptake crop like sugar beets than after such crops as sorghum or potatoes.
