Montana University Professor Gary Crosby Finally Gets Spurger High School Diploma

Editor's note: The following is an excerpt of a letter from Dr. Gary Crosby, University of Montana, to the University of Montana Academic Vice President, Richard Landin, notifying him of a "change" in Crosby's educational background.

"There are some basic qualifications for teaching at the University level. One of them should be a high school diploma. I feel very strongly about this and speak with some authority of the subject. Although there is a significant percentage of University teachers who have earned their PhD, some still are lacking their Master's, and the record shows that there are even a few cases of individuals lacking their Bachelor's who nonetheless teach some beginning laboratory courses. There is virtually no one without a high school degree in my many years on various campuses. The only case of which I am aware in my own year, I was a high school dropout.

"The fact of this problem that gnawed away at me constantly was the poor showing in the faculty election to which I contributed significantly. Now on a campus like mine, with a large faculty, it would not have even been noticed in the percentages had I not had the PhD. But lacking the high school degree, prevented a very strong effort. The fact that it was the only one, and especially in that category, motivated it into a figure that was impossible to ignore.

"The opportunity of that state academic award as an institution of embarrassment that drove my colleagues to discover the origin. There was no such thing as anonymity. And to be sure, these figures find their way into widely distributed professional papers and government statistical summations. The result of it being that the word spread far beyond the bounds of my own campus. Knowing little else about our institution, educators from across the land formulated definite opinions about the shaky operation going on at our school.

"Actually, there wasn't much left to do to complete the degree requirements, which makes it all the more embarrassing that I procrastinated this important undertaking so long. One reason was all that was needed, I suppose I explained myself by rationalizing that the situation that made this report necessary arose through no fault of my own. What happened was that I failed to submit a final report in a high school agriculture class.

"Agriculture was an important applied course, perhaps the most important at the rural high schools in the region where I grew up in Spurger, Texas. One requirement each semester for the duration of high school was required of all boys. An integral part of the program was a practical farm project that came during the final senior year. This would be the growing of some cash crop or the raising of an animal. An accurate set of books were to be maintained showing expenditures related to production, and this offset by the sale of the product at the end of the year.

"Before getting underway, our agriculture teacher was careful to explain that showing a profit was not necessarily a requisite to winning an A grade. For safety all; had, tornado, epidemic, and other acts of God could inadvertently interfere with the most perfectly executed program. So long as our training was brought to bear, and we made every effort to be a good citizen, we would not be penalized for a grade.

"For my part, I chose to raise two goats. The two kids, christened Oscar and Oscar II, cost me $25 each at my age three weeks. Four dollars in the debt column. Their emotional transition from maine to little black cow only a few days and by the end of the first week they were not only fully adjusted but were producing substantial milk for their new surroundings.

"I bought a sack of hay and with the appropriate entry in the books set about to wear the little fellows and build some muscle.

"That the program collapsed abruptly in a humbling tragedy. On that black night my brother carelessly left his auto open and the flames of Oscar wandered out onto the railroad tracks. Proudly a large and menacing convulsion approached, threatening their territory. They bravely called his bluff, squared off, lowered their heads, and charged. Their raw courage was laudable, but sparing the details Oscar and Elmer came off second best in the encounter. Following the brief grave-site rites, I recorded the following entry: 'September 29: goats killed by train.' and closed the book.

"Next May, in the height of graduation excitement, an account of our work came due. When the instructor reviewed mine it was immediately apparent that I had incurred his wrath. In fact, I think it fair to say he was incensed. Possibly it would not be far wide of the mark to state that he was downright seething with rebellion. He called me, and undoubtedly to know the magnitude of this shabby performance. I stressed that what happened was no fault of my own, and reminded him that in the previous September I was left with the situation (implication that under those circumstances it was still possible for me to get my grade). He reluctantly agreed that I had not garbled his message to him, but that the calamity happened when the academic year was only three weeks old, and that I had plenty of time to undertake an alternate project in order to reap the substantial benefits of the program.

"And he was absolutely right of course. But by that time, here certainly was no time to take the time to embark on another project. So we searched for a compromise, and eventually struck on a plan whereby I would complete a library research project on some facet of agriculture and submit it to fulfill the course requirement.

"But it was then only two days from the scheduled graduation exercises and I did not seem likely that a credible report would be put together so quickly. In consultation with school and county officials we negotiated a scheme to please almost everyone. I would march across the stage in full academic regalia, receive my diploma, which would bear the signatures of the school's principal and superintendent, but not that of the county superintendent. I would submit an acceptable report afterwards, the accomplished list of graduation would be noted on the official records, and I could then take my diploma to the county school office for the final signature.

"I recall that summer I was in Montana, was accepted at the University and still anxiously awaiting word of completing the report. The task fell by the wayside over the years.

"Circumstances brought me back to my old high school town this year, some 23 years after graduation. Although I had been a complete beginner of facts and administrative, and may know me personally, my name was apparently well known. As a matter of fact, a photograph of me was mounted in the hall over the trophy case. When my present colleagues at the University knew that I regretted and never will amount to anything, I was something of a prize for the local high school assembly to furnish living proof that (being in that small rural school did not necessarily preclude a promising career to the very pinnacle of fulfillment. I was introduced in a rather glowing manner as the only graduate of that school to have gone on to win a doctoral degree.

"After the assembly I asked the principal and superintendent if they were aware that I had not graduated from their school. They obviously were not aware of it, and for some time refused to take the suggestion seriously.

"After a search of the files proved my unorthodox status, they offered to give me the degree based on my subsequent accomplishments.

"No, I said, I wouldn't want to do that, being in the teaching business myself, I disliked double standards, and I would feel a little dishonest about accepting the award without having actually earned it. It just everyone else. (Highest) award I would not have been awarded. If it became known that I had been awarded the degree without having fulfilled the requirements, that would hurt me. I could go somewhere and get a PhD and come back here and demand a high school diploma. And who would that leave you mentioned that I would be in town several days while waiting for my car to be repaired, and that should give me plenty of time to complete the report. I did just that and graduated. Now I can hold my head high as I walk the oval on campus, proud full fellowship with my peers, and feel truly exhilarated at being able to dispense quality instruction to my students."

JUST A MINUTE

By DONALD CLARK

You might say that Mrs. Mary Jackson, a Monroe, Michigan housewife, had her hands full: she had a shopping bag, a handle, a handle of oil, and her three-year-old child. When she stepped to the store to buy a few more groceries, she found the shelves empty. The store was closed. Mrs. Jackson was waiting, waiting, waiting for the store to open. She was waiting for the store to open. She was waiting for the store to open.

Forest Facts

Commercial forests in the U.S. total 509 million acres. Pine, a Rocky Mountain tree species, is found in the Guadalupe and Davis Mountains of West Texas.
 Forest insects and diseases, although usually not fatal to trees, are a constant threat to the forest. The most serious pest of the pine is the pine sawfly, which kills as much timber as any other insect pest. The forest fire is also a major threat to the forest.
